Becca Wasser, a Senior Fellow in the Defense Program at CNAS, Full Report (61 頁)

Comment: The United States faces an unprecedented challenge: simultaneously deterring large-scale conventional aggression by two nuclear-armed powers. The nation will need to deter these major adversaries from overt aggression in the near term in two primary, yet distinct, regions: China in the Indo-Pacific and Russia in Europe. A new approach to simultaneous deterrence is needed. The United States has never had to contend with the challenge of potential conflict with two nuclear-armed, near-peer competitors at the same time. Campaigning must be improved to enable the DoD to effectively achieve its aims and focus peacetime deterrence efforts on simultaneous challenges posed by China and Russia. To accomplish this, campaigning should be better linked to warfighting.
